What is the best version to use?

There are three options: If you need Auto-package, pay or get a license. If you don't need this then you don't need the Orcad Capture add-in. If you already have the Autopackage licensed version of Orcad running, you can go the free version of Orcad Capture add-in.

If you do not have the Autopackage license, you should use a version of Orcad that came after Orcad 16.5, otherwise you may have problems. I use the Autopackage version 17.5.1. That said, I have no idea why you say to use pcb. Auto-package, free, open source, etc. All three work for me, I prefer the free version. But if you have a lot of other stuff to add to the PCB, then I'd recommend going with Altium Designer First things first, download And install it Open the Office installer: And then install the product, choosing the right version for you: You have now installed ADM 2020. If this is your first time, it will prompt you for your username and password. Set this up. You will then be prompted for your system details: Choose Administrative, then Local Users, then click on the Add User button. Enter a username and password for the new user Click OK to create the new user. Next, you need to configure settings for this user. Go to Start > Administrative Tools.

Now you will need to create a group, usually called CAD. Make sure you add this user to that group. If it says that it could not add the user, log out and log back in. You will then be asked if you want to allow this user to log in. Answer yes, and continue. Once you have an active admin account, visit start > control panel. You should see a section called Administrative Tools. Expand it, double-click on Local Security Policy, and click on Properties, allowing you to select or clear a list of user accounts In your case you can leave it blank, as you are only trying to use this for one user.

Now, you should be able to add the ADM Management Console to the right-click menu when right-clicking on the desktop. Drag and drop the ADM Management console to your
