I am reading a paper about encryption algorithms and the author states that a deterministic encryption algorithm is a one that has the property that there is a correct answer and the algorithm will produce that same correct answer given the same input. This is a broad term and I am not sure what it means in more detail. For example "A deterministic encryption algorithm is one that produces the same output for the same input with the same key". This is a trivial property that can be applied to many algorithms but does not convey much information. A: Deterministic means that, under the same input, the output is the same. On Wikipedia: A deterministic algorithm is one where any particular output from the algorithm is guaranteed to be determined by a single given input. Given that definition, a deterministic encryption algorithm would be one where, under the same input (in the same encryption key/passphrase/key file), the encryption functions always produce the same output. Which could be specifically "the same output" with the same key, or a specific output on a particular passphrase (where the function is the same under every valid passphrase). Deterministic without order means that, for the same input, the output is the same without regard to order. The Wikipedia definition again: A deterministic algorithm is one where every possible output is guaranteed to occur, under the same
